

The morning was cold and she walked the length of the garden without once looking back toward the quiet house where the others were still sleeping under heavy blankets. She had rehearsed the words for weeks and still they came out wrong whenever she tried to say them to anyone at all. There was frost on the grass and the light was very thin. Somewhere behind her a door opened and then closed again. She counted her steps to the gate and back, twice over.

SWANS

The morning was cold and she walked the length of the garden without once looking back toward the quiet house where the others were still sleeping under heavy blankets. She had rehearsed the words for weeks and still they came out wrong whenever she tried to say them to anyone at all. There was frost on the grass and the light was very thin. Somewhere behind her a door opened and then closed again. She counted her steps to the gate and back, twice over. she stood there in the cold and waited for the bathroom light to come on somewhere above the garden wall. The morning was cold and she walked the length of the garden without once looking back toward the quiet house where the others were still sleeping under heavy blankets. She had rehearsed the words for weeks and still they came out wrong whenever she tried to say them to anyone at all. There was frost on the grass and the light was very thin. Somewhere behind her a door opened and then closed again. She counted her steps to the gate and back, twice over.

SWANS

The morning was cold and she walked the length of the garden without once looking back toward the quiet house where the others were still sleeping under heavy blankets. She had rehearsed the words for weeks and still they came out wrong whenever she tried to say them to anyone at all. There was frost on the grass and the light was very thin. Somewhere behind her a door opened and then closed again. She counted her steps to the gate and back, twice over.

I remembered the letters and how they had been signed.
The morning was cold and she walked the length of the garden without once looking back toward the quiet house where the others were still sleeping under heavy blankets.
She had rehearsed the words for weeks and still they came out wrong whenever she tried to say them to anyone at all.
There was frost on the grass and the light was very thin.
Somewhere behind her a door opened and then closed again.
She counted her steps to the gate and back, twice over.

SWANS

The morning was cold and she walked the length of the garden without once looking back toward the quiet house where the others were still sleeping under heavy blankets. She had rehearsed the words for weeks and still they came out wrong whenever she tried to say them to anyone at all. There was frost on the grass and the light was very thin. Somewhere behind her a door opened and then closed again. She counted her steps to the gate and back, twice over.